LONDON, June 10.—In the house of commons Sir Michael Hicks-Beach moved an amendment to Sir Hugh Childer's motion for a second reading of the budget. He condemned the inconsistency of the government in increasing the duties on beer and spirits while d-clining to impose a fresh tax on real property and urged an increased tax upon wines corresponding with that sough to be levid upon beer and spirits. The government's proposals he declared to be unjust and financially unsound, and would result in the buyer getting an adulterated article intested of a smaller quantity for his money. Why not tax tea additionally? The government was afraid to do so.

Sir Charles Dilks defended the budget and said that ten is already taxed too heavily. The question he said is not one of altering the budget bud life or death to the government.

Ture bitter teeling against Mr. Beck in this city and county is on account of his contemptuous disregard of the wishes of the Democracy as a body and his boorish treatment of representatives of the party who visited him at Washington. The Democrats asked of him nothing further than that a candidate might be named who would be acceptable to the party and to the people generally; but this request, which the Democracy had the right to expect should be respectfully regarded, was set aside with the curt reply that "he had heard enough about the matter and desired to hear nothing more." It was made perfectly clear that no Democrat, whatever his standing in the party might be, could get a hearing from him, and this arbitrary and contemptuous treatment of the men who helped to place him where he is, is what has arouse!
